There were some the scene at the wharf where it is indeed terrible to witness brave men whom we saw but a few days tince in our streets in full health, now isanguishing and writhing with the pain of gharif wounds. The men were conveyed to the virtous hospitals in ambulances, and our sity presented a busy sight as these vehicles were ratifing through the streets.

About 1,000 more wounded left headquarters at Falmouth, about four o'block yeaterday afternoon, and strived during its sight.

DESERTERS.—Vestorday afternoon, thirty-five deserters were brought to this city, from the North in charge of a licutionant. They were picked up in various Northern cities, and were almost as forlor-docking men as the "thutternuts" usually are, which many supposed them to be, as they passed through the streets. They were seast to licorgetown, from whence they will be forwarded to their respective regiments.

We give below the substance of General Came-nou's remarks, who was quite eloquent on this co-casion:

After complimenting the society, he spoke of the importance of looking to the walfare of sol-diers, and said it was far better for our sol-diers to be sent home, to be cared for by their rela-tives and friends, than to be kept here, at Govern-ment expense, away from those home influences which are very much calculated to extere men to health. He demounced the policy of keeping these men here, and claimed that the same patriculum which brought them here would, when they recov-ered, bring them back again. Speaking of the proposed Christmas dinner, he said: "My God, better send them home and let them ent a crust of bread by their own firesides." In reference to the war, he said we make the through, however great the sacrification, there could be no compromise, and is to reconstruction, there could be no reconstruction of a house with rotten and sound timber.

THE WOUNDED.—Besides the number sent to this elly resterday—nearly 3.000—we learn that a large number were sent to item mond hospital, at large number were sent to item mond hospital, at Point Acokout, Ma.
